

Abstact

Samples of burnt clay from kilns in various parts of the country were tested for their cementitious qualities and found to have high silica contents. Results showed that adding up to 40% of the clay to Portland cement produced good binders for mass concrete and plaster work, particularly for low cost housing.